This type refers to the Greek legend of the Seven Against Thebes. Kapaneus, descendant of Proetus - King of Argos, was one of the seven commanders who agreed to help Polynices recover his throne from his brother. All but one of the seven died in the ensuing seige. Kapaneus was struck down by Zeus while boasting that even the Gods could not prevent him from scaling the walls. It is unclear what relevance all this has to Byzia in Thrace other than making an exciting story. See the play by Aeschylus.

This denarius is the model for the restored issue of Trajan with the word COCLES added before Roma's face. COCLES means "deprived of one eye" and was the surname of the Horatia gens after its legendary hero, Horatia Cocles, who had prevented the Etrurian forces under King Porsena from entering Rome. The female head is supposed to be that of one Horatia, the betrothed of one of the Curiatii (an ancient gens of which three brothers fought against three of the Horatii). In any event, modern numismatists have made the assumption that this coin was originally struck by a descendant of that family which is speculation as Michael Crawford notes in his work.
